Read the following passage and answer the given questions. Sayer Daheir began a modest printing press many decades ago, choosing to begin his venture with a deep respect for the traditional arts of printing and book binding. At a time when modern technology had started to look more appealing to many entrepreneurs, he remained loyal to the classic methods passed down through skilled craftsmen. Every page that left his workshop carried such precision that visitors often felt, with quiet admiration, that there seems no mistake in the delicate strokes of his work. As the years moved forward, Sayer gradually welcomed his children and relatives into the business so the heritage would never fade. In 1999, his children and siblings finally _____ the company, having taken it much like one took a treasure, determined to guard the original techniques their ancestor had loved. They carefully continued the old art of binding and even enriched it by offering metal nameplates to customise each piece, which gave every book an identity of its own. Those who once worked at DA needed no other certificate; the very fact that they had honed their skill there was proof enough of their craftsmanship and dedication. Today, when tourists arrive, the entire workshop seems to look like a living museum where every corner appears to hold stories of timeless artistry. Generations later, the tradition thrives with the same spirit. Hadiya, Sayer's fourth-generation niece, now works beside her elders and adds her own quiet strength to the family's work. The press that Sayer once founded—and which his heirs later took possession from him—remains a place where artistry speaks louder than machines. Visitors continue to be drawn to its quiet charm and enduring beauty. Over decades and decades, the Daheir legacy has shown that true artistry starts with passion and is sustained by patience. Without relying on modern technology, the company stands as a living example of how dedication and skill can transform simple materials into timeless art, keeping alive a heritage where there seems no mistake in the harmony between tradition and excellence.

8. Which of the following best explains why visitors found the workshop's pages impressive?
- (a) The pages were produced using highly advanced machinery imported from overseas.
 - (b) The books featured metallic covers that reflected modern design sensibilities.
 - (c) The design was intricate and consistent, reflecting care and expert craftsmanship.
 - (d) Each book was endorsed by famous artists to increase its credibility.
 - (e) The pages were produced in large batches ensuring mass production accuracy.
9. What can be inferred about the transition of the business in 1999?
- (a) It was done unwillingly due to financial decline and pressure from competition.
 - (b) The family preserved traditional values while adding unique personal touches.
 - (c) It marked a shift from traditional to completely digital production methods.
 - (d) The business lost its original character after Sayer's retirement.
 - (e) Outsiders were hired to bring a fresh perspective to the legacy.
10. Which of the following statements is CORRECT according to the passage? (A) Hadiya represents the latest generation contributing to the Daheir heritage. (B) In 1999, the original workshop was sold to external investors and rebranded. (C) The use of metal nameplates was introduced to add uniqueness to the books.
